Changing the Narrative: Digital Storytelling for Health

Stories are how we teach, persuade, and relate with one another in the interconnected world where we live. With the growing landscape of digital and social media, there is a greater need than ever to share our lives with one another. In this age of shrinking public health budgets and rising public health needs, storytelling can be a powerful and cost-effective tool to help move patients and policymakers to action. It was only two years ago that the Ice Bucket Challenge swept the nation, raising awareness for ALS and generating $41.8 million in donations in a one-month span. It was the stories of these Ice Bucket participants that helped make this a viral sensation.

By sharing successful methods used by advertisers and marketers, this session will help to spark ideas and empower participants to use stories to change lives in their communities.

Jon Stemmle, Associate Professor,
University of Missouri School of Journalism
